ABSTRAKT:

The emergence of the Holocaust as a theme in contemporary Spanish politics, culture and society could be considered merely part of the wider phenomenon called the 'globalisation of the Holocaust'. A study of the political and social specificities of this trend in the context of the law of historical memory and recent scholarship on the Spanish Civil War reveals interesting elements of this phenomenon. An analysis of a selection of examples of Holocaust commemoration and representation in contemporary Spain can help to better identify the emergence of a public discourse on European identity that seems to diverge attention from painful memories of the Civil War. More interesting, however, is the fact that Shoah commemoration may elicit a simultaneous desirable effect in that it can also engage Spaniards in a needed rigorous assessment of the role of Fascism in our country and in Europe throughout the 20th century.
